Excerpt from Human Documents: Character-Sketches of Representative Men and Women of the Time The whole man thinks. The brain itself is only part of the apparatus by which the individual, sometimes consciously, sometimes unconsciously, guides himself amidst his surroundings. In a thousand fashions day by day he is making the test of his powers, and Nature is returning to him her inexorable verdict. The man's intellectual work is determined in great measure by his physical constitution and his emotional quality. Byron's lame foot and Carlyle's dyspepsia have become classical, and the examples of Swift, Rousseau, Luxembourg, Turenne, Plotinus, Kant, and a thousand others could be cited by way of showing how physical peculiarities may give a cast to a man's whole intellectual life.
